

SPACE STATION CHALLENGE

Face off against your family members in a hilarious hands-on race to design a mini space station! Each family member will design and build his or her own space station using toothpicks, popsicle sticks, glue, and other household materials. Here's the catch: You have to follow the rules!

Technology that our brightest engineers build for use in space is complex and takes a lot of planning. The space station you build today won't be used in space (!), so encourage everyone to get creative. It's good to try to mirror the general look of NASA space stations (do an online image search of the International Space Station), but this design is your own—having fun is the first step.

1. Players are welcome to use unlimited toothpicks, popsicle sticks, and glue for their projects, but must collect all of their other materials before starting to build. After construction begins, no materials other than the unlimited supplies can be added.
2. Each player must use at least three (any three) of the following materials:
  - Coins
  - Rubber bands
  - Marbles
  - Something edible
  - Paper clips
  - Any household item not being used by another builder!
3. Before construction starts, each family member will donate one type of building material to another player, so that while you're all giving away your stock in that material, you're gaining a different building resource altogether. Go around the room one time, so that each player gets a turn to donate, but also gains a NEW material to help him or her build.
4. It's GO time. Players get exactly one hour to complete their stations. See the illustration above for help. When the timer rings, hands off.
5. After the glue and paint dry, each player will judge the other stations on a scale of 1 (hated it) to 5 (loved it). Who's the master space station builder? Tally the points to find out!
